

ANYONE HAVING 2006 FLASHBACKS?

Because I am.

I find myself writing long weedy posts about Cheney's role in the CIA Leak Case. And Karl Rove spent a long day answering questions about his role in a crime. (h/t fatster)

Former White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove was deposed Tuesday by attorneys for the House Judiciary Committee, according to Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the panel's chairman.

Rove's deposition began at 10 a.m. and ended around 6:30 p.m, with several breaks, Conyers said.

Conyers would not comment on what Rove told congressional investigators, what the next step in the long-running Judiciary Committee investigation would be or whether Rove would face additional questioning.

"He was deposed today," Conyers said in an interview. "That's all I can tell you."

Eight and a half hours? That's a lot of questions.

Supposedly, there will be transcripts produced, Harriet and Karl will review them, and then we'll all get our greedy little hands on them. Given that it's summertime in our nation's capital, it'll take at least a few weeks for all that to transpire.

But we might get a Karl transcript before we get a Cheney interview.
