

SO-SO TUESDAY MEANDERINGS

Even eight hours after polls started closing on the Super Tuesday primaries yesterday, I see little of real interest in yesterday's results.

The biggest news of the day remains that we're rid of Kristen Sinema, which should make it easier for Ruben Gallego to replace her.

Another big news nugget yesterday confirmed what some had speculated: that when Elon Musk flew to West Palm Beach the other day, it was to allow Trump to beg him for cash. Musk famously demands full board control in business negotiations; imagine how such a discussion would go with Trump's campaign team, who thus far have run a far more professional show than Trump's past Presidential elections. Or, for that matter, Xitter under Musk's direction.

Speaking of Nazi sympathizers, the North Carolina GOP nominated a Black Holocaust denier to run for governor.

Adam Schiff and Steve Garvey will face off to take Dianne Feinstein's seat – and sadly, the progressives weren't even close.

Nikki Haley appears to have won Vermont.
[Update: At 10AM, Haley will suspend her campaign but not yet endorse Trump.] Joe Biden appears to have lost American Samoa.
[Correction: Updated reporting says it was a delegate tie.]

It will take days to figure out how much of Haley's vote – under 20% in more conservative states and Texas – reflected cross-overs. Similarly, it'll take some time to understand the significance of protest votes against Joe Biden, the most significant of which was in Minnesota. And given what a weird situation a two incumbent general presents it'll take days to figure out what the turnout means for Biden and Trump.

One of the most important measures, in my opinion, is in where and how Latinos voted – particularly if Colin Allred, now the Democratic nominee in Texas, has a chance of replacing Ted Cruz. Again, it'll take days to make sense of that.

The big takeaway right now is that a whole lot of people don't want to be facing a Trump-Biden rematch. But as of yesterday, it is virtually certain that's what will happen.